

How is a medical intuitive different from a medical practitioner?

How is a medical intuitive different from a medical practitioner?

Written by Faye Baxter, medical intuitive from Medical Intuitive Solutions, transcribed from her journal on her resource website.

A medical practitioner's expertise is based on what is taught through their university training, internship and time spent in hospital placements together with the knowledge and expertise gained through the many consultations they undertake each day. Some medical practitioners will also go by what is known as gut-feeling on occasions, although these are rare.

Some medical practitioners will stay in general practice with a range of exposure to the various conditions which confront them each day. They will use the available technology such as X-ray, Ct scan, MRI, blood tests and a range of other tests to identify illness or disease and generally will prescribe medications to treat.

In some instances, where the problem is outside their field of expertise, they will refer to a specialist in the relevant area of medicine.

The specialist may redo the tests already completed or refer a patient for further tests and depending on the results of those tests may prescribe more specific treatments and in some cases intervention via surgery. In the case of cancers, they may refer a patient for radiation therapy or chemotherapy at a specialised cancer clinic.

Several allied health professionals who have undergone a similar form of training to develop their skills and may also be involved in a patient's treatment. These could include a dietitian who will help a patient to develop a better eating plan to support their treatment.

Often a physiotherapist is required to help a patient recover from surgery. Depending on the patient's illness or disease, they might be referred to a counsellor or psychologist who may assist a patient to working through issues around their condition.

The common theme with medical practitioners and allied health professionals is that they are working with the physical body, purely with what the anatomy and physiology tells them through their many tests.

The exception could be psychologists and counsellors working with emotions and beliefs and who may spend years working with a client on those issues.

The body is viewed in a more holistic way by a professional medical intuitive with no separation of mind, body and spirit. They are all connected. The energy in and around the body is what speaks to a medical intuitive.

The energy never lies and through the questioning, a process that a professional medical intuitive employs, they will assess the health and wellbeing of a client based on their energy and the response of their energy to the questioning process. They are also able to see or feel potential problems that are sitting in a client's energy fields which have not yet manifested in the physical body. A professional medical intuitive uses energy to remove the underlying destructive emotional cause stored in a client's cellular memory and remove any potential future threats to a client's physical body.

In the case of emotional issues, a professional medical intuitive will utilise their ability to see energy to determine the underlying destructive emotions and work with a client to remove the associated cellular memory and make better choices in their future life.

Much is talked about regarding beliefs, but they are rarely a reality. They are fears based on past experiences or lack of understanding. A professional medical intuitive will help clients work with their fears and beliefs rather than being controlled by them. Fear is simply a fantasy that may never happen. A professional medical intuitive will always refer a client back to their medical practitioner or specialist when the problem is outside their abilities. A medical intuitive is often consulted when a person is unwell and has not been able to obtain a diagnosis from the barrage of tests undertaken.

Summary

Often a professional medical intuitive will identify the area to be looked at by observing a client's energy and referring the client back to their medical practitioner with this information. The work of a medical intuitive will not be contraindicated with any medical intervention and will likely enhance the effectiveness of the treatment.
